Thank You!

Dear Mr. Kivett,

Cancer can strike a person at any age – young or old. But since most early detection guidelines are aimed at adults aged 40 and older, many people don't consider the importance of cancer prevention early in life. The fact is that childhood is a critical time for making lifestyle choices that reduce cancer risk.

Nearly 60 percent of cancers could be prevented if people adopted healthier lifestyle behaviors during childhood. That's why the American Cancer Society is committed to providing parents and schools with valuable cancer prevention information. The Society has helped 15,000 US school districts deliver coordinated school health programs to influence more than 45 million school children to make healthier lifestyle choices.

Parents and teachers are learning more about how to protect children from childhood overexposure to the sun, which greatly increases skin cancer risk later in life. Children are learning to eat healthy and get plenty of exercise to avoid childhood obesity and overweight, conditions that often carry over into adulthood and increase cancer risk. Youth are being taught the dangers of tobacco use and young smokers are getting access to cessation programs to quit for life.

These are just a few ways the American Cancer Society is working to reduce cancer incidence and mortality for the next generation. And it is only through the generous support of forward-thinking donors like you that this lifesaving work can continue. Because of your commitment and support, many of today's children may never hear the words, "You have cancer" in their lifetime. Thank you again for your dedication to eliminating cancer.

Sincerely,

John R. Seffrin, PhD
